RE: Protecting the Snake and Columbia River salmon.

Dear General Strock:

I am writing today to comment on the draft plan for protecting the Snake and Columbia River salmon. Draft scientific and economic reports indicate that partial removal of the four dams on the lower Snake River are the best and only real option for the fish's recovery and for the economy of the Pacific Northwest. Removal of these dams must be the centerpiece for any action chosen to recover the Snake River salmon populations. If these dams are not breached, all species of salmon and steel head trout in the Snake River are likely to be extinct by the year 2017. Maintaining these dams, to have Lewiston, Idaho represent a seaport, at the benefit of a few, seems to make no sense in the greater good of the entire region. Restoring the salmon in the Snake River ecosystem will have a far greater benefit to the region economically.

I have fished on occasion for salmon in the Pacific Northwest and in lower Alaska. It is magnificent to see these creatures returning upstream to spawn. Their migration supports an entire ecosystem. It would be a tragic loss to allow the short sighted persistence of these four federal dams on the lower Snake to cause the demise of these species.

Again, I would strongly encourage the removal of these dams as part of the Snake River salmon recovery program.

Sincerely,

Gary A. Ludi, M.D.
